We also observed an association between renal impairment and DILI incidence. However, because this analysis was observational, the observed associations are not sufficient to establish causality. Further prospective studies are warranted to confirm these results. A limitation of this study is that we do not know the exact reason for any of the DILI episodes. Because of the lack of information about the underlying causes of DILI, it is not possible to distinguish between cases of DILI and of spontaneous remission. However, this should not be of major concern in view of the high DILI incidence rates observed in our study. In conclusion, in the current study, the pooled incidence rate of DILI was 7.9 cases per 1000 patient-years (95% CI: 6.3--9.4), and the proportion of patients experiencing at least one DILI was 30.9%. The incidence of DILI was higher in the perioperative phase of LT compared with the other phases, and it was highest in the first six months after LT.
