This paper reports on the first three years of a study on social anxiety and social phobia in a group of paediatric social phobia (PSP) patients. Previous studies on the topic mainly included adult subjects, and PSP is believed to have a later onset and a better prognosis than adult social phobia (ASP). To address this issue, a questionnaire was constructed for use in prospective interviews. The aim was to investigate the course, prognosis, and predictors for successful treatment of PSP. Between 2009 and 2013, a group of 42 children and adolescents with PSP was followed prospectively at regular intervals by means of a questionnaire. The results showed a gradual improvement from baseline to follow-up in the items 'externalising symptoms', 'sleep difficulties', 'work', and 'self-esteem'. Significant differences between baseline and follow-up responses were found on six of the items, thus indicating that change had occurred. However, the percentage of patients in remission at follow-up was 38%, thus indicating that not all patients with PSP will respond to treatment. It is suggested that the majority of patients with PSP may be able to function in some activities normally. However, a significant minority is unable to cope in certain situations without intense stress. It is also found that a negative response expectancy about the effects of treatment is related to dropout.

Q: Why was my comment deleted? I posted a comment to this question: I'd like to contribute but i keep getting the error "Your account is temporarily suspended. Please wait for the system to unblock you." Why was it deleted? A: Roughly speaking, we can distinguish between two types of comments. Both can be placed on any question, answer or comment, but one usually has the 3e33713323
