The passage of antimalarial drugs through the gastrointestinal tract was studied in two groups of healthy volunteers. The first group received a single dose of chloroquine 500 mg orally, and the second, of amodiaquine 250 mg, on separate days. In both groups, drug levels were measured in blood and urine over a 72 h period, following drug administration. Drug levels were also measured in stools as well as in vomit produced by volunteers taking the amodiaquine. Drug levels were measured by gas chromatography. The mean gastrointestinal transit times were 34.0 and 46.8 h, respectively, for chloroquine and amodiaquine. In both groups, the chloroquine reached peak levels in the blood (Cmax) by 8.5 h. Thereafter the levels declined with a terminal half-life of 32.9 +/- 7.8 h. The levels in the urine were variable, but the Cmax and terminal half-life were similar to those in the blood. There were no statistically significant differences in the absorption of chloroquine between the two groups of volunteers. Amodiaquine was completely absorbed. The Cmax was reached by 9.3 h, with a terminal half-life of 84.9 +/- 33.5 h. There was no excretion in the urine, and the terminal half-life was similar to that in the blood. Gastric emptying of the ingested amodiaquine was slow, as only 37.5% of the drug was recovered from the vomited stools. Residues of amodiaquine were present in the stools for up to 72 h.Q: How to make a div more responsive when its width is smaller than a certain amount?
