A protein required for uptake of exogenous RNA by tobacco cells. Tobacco cells accumulate large amounts of RNA when grown on media containing extracts of Nicotiana glauca (callus) in the presence of actinomycin D. A major protein (76 kDa) which is specifically required for uptake of exogenous RNA, was isolated from callus in high salt (0.5 M) solution by precipitation with trichloroacetic acid. This protein behaves like a nucleic acid binding protein in: (a) it is capable of binding to RNA; (b) it readily precipitated by excess guanosine 3'5' monophosphate; (c) it required Mn<sup>2+</sup> ions to be active but it was active in the presence of other divalent cations such as Mg<sup>2+</sup>. Its activity was inhibited by high concentrations of salt, and by other proteins or nucleic acids. By in vitro translation of [35S]methionine-labeled RNA, it was shown that this protein can bind specifically to the mRNA molecules. ### What's new:

Sublime Last week, food—saturated fat—was the subject of one of those Very Important Pop-Physics articles in the New York Times.<sup>1</sup> In it, John Tierney wrote a glorious long (1,778 words!) essay on the phenomenology, energy and mobility of food, which we who enjoy it will presumably find dull and warm and twinkly. Yet what is so amazing about food is not its ineffable sensuousness, it is the actual robust determination of its motion, the twisty wanderlust of its molecular-level motions. In most dishes, it seems, something happens to food. Hot oil fills the surface of an eggplant, a cutlet, or a piece of meat, which then responds to the combination of heat and oil with “a crisping of molecules, a subtle but profound change...known as recrystallization” and a somewhat more robust “confusion” that tends to keep the cutlet from re-forming into a one-piece object, its constituent meat molecules well arranged, but “fleeing” to even more agreeable places.<sup>2</sup> Crispations and confusions happen in and on dishes, though all of us will agree they make food taste good, by delivering what Chef Grandinetti calls “an explosion of flavor.” Then there are the magic numbers. There must be a trick to it, as Tierney urges us to guess and find out. How can you get hot oil to get inside a piece of protein and stay there? Boundary, or skin, layer? Saturated fatty acids make for some of this but there’s another trick. Texture. How to make both crispy and tender? Texture is more than just the absence of a perfect crumb, it’s the very tiny appreciable movement of food molecules that binds crumb to mouth and brain. We intuitively know that foods like pasta and mashed potatoes or a home-baked pie crust are “textures” to be enjoyed. Not firm and overall satisfying, but made out of little bits that arise and move, that disappear and reappear. For Tierney, this is just a flavor distraction, and one less interesting than what is actually inside the mouth. In particular, U.S. news in the time of Donald Trump has been so bizarre and seemingly motivated by what not to think about that one never knows what to believe. So is it all a big
