As any game does, I don't think its very likely that Minecraft has an antivirus signature included with its JAR file. However, I wondered whether minecraft uses some kind of - my assumption is it would be - security scheme? A: JAR files usually don't contain signatures for various reasons. The technology is dead, JAR files are a relic of the past that has been replaced by modern technologies. The Java API for example is part of the JRE, and is not required to be distributed separately. Apart from that, signatures are not really helpful against malware. Malware often uses obfuscation and other tricks to make detection harder. tldr: Minecraft uses Java, not JAR files. using System; using System.Collections.Generic; using System.Text; using Android.App; using Android.Content; using Android.OS; using Android.Runtime; using Android.Views; using Android.Widget;
