Q: Cloud Db in Raspberry Pi I have a Raspberry Pi Model B and I would like to run a cloud-based database application on it. I would like to ask suggestions of the best cloud based database application which could run on Raspberry Pi or on my laptop. I am currently using MongoDB. What I would like to know is what the best database is for Raspberry Pi? A: You have a couple of options: If the app is meant for quick and cheap development, then a cloud-based database (like MongoDB) would be ideal. If you intend to build a server that will work for months, then a self-hosting database like MySQL might be a better choice. If you are expecting to run a GUI application that the user will use regularly, then you may need a database that allows for a more complicated user interface than SQLite or MySQL. One of these is probably better for the Pi. For example, Pylons (Python) and Ruby Enterprise Edition have Web based GUIs. As for the "which cloud based database application is best" question, that is off-topic for StackOverflow. The spacing is coming from the edges of the two div's. I have been trying to get this to work for a few days now, but I am completely stuck. This is what I have so far:
#logo { background:url(""); background-size:100%; background-repeat:no-repeat; height: 100px; width: 50px; } #content { border:1px solid red; margin:0px -20px; padding:25px; } A: Try adding this to your CSS: display: inline-block; methods) { var httpResponse = client.Get(context.Request.Uri); if (httpResponse.StatusCode!= HttpStatusCode.OK) { var httpResponseMessage = httpResponse.ToString(); foreach (var message in httpResponseMessage.Substring(httpResponseMessage.IndexOf("nbsp"),Split(',')).Split(',') { if (message.Trim().Length == 0
