MS Office 2013 also seems to have a bit more work taking place when using the Viewer. This is especially likely with extensive pages of really complicated charts. I compared my spreadsheet after working with the Viewer with one that I did on the standard version (the clue was the presence or absence of the red throbber). And, while there were a few more bytes in the Viewer's spreadsheet than the "normal" one, as a whole they seem to be handled with equal efficiency. Not to say that this new update does not speed things up, as I did enjoy some faster processing time. In previous versions, I had to uncheck "Start with last session" before loading a project having to do with multiple spreadsheet views. The software generally saved the setting after closing the project. In the newest version, it does not. Maybe I am being a bit overly sensitive, but I just seemed to notice this a few days after switching to the Viewer version, so I hardly think I am oversensitive at all. However, it is clear that the new version is, as ever, a thinner wrapper, and it is this that actually makes the Viewer more streamlined and more functional. I also found that the classic menu options are faster to use in the Office Viewer projects. For example, I had plenty of instances where I wanted to copy a cell in one view to a specific cell in a different view. So, with the Viewer Toolbar I generally accessed the Copy Cell function. But, with the classic menu options, I could then simply select the "Copy" option from the Edit menu. And, honestly, it felt to be faster that way, maybe because I was still getting used to the new view. Still, it is clear that these legacy menu options are now generally slightly faster than those of the Viewer; certainly, more hassle-free. Similar things can be said about the Viewer Toolbar. Of course, you can still use the same old functions, so you will not be forced out of the old-style menus and menu options.
