Now that you are at your home screen, you can open folders where you have stored all your photos and choose which photos to add to your catalog. If you use Lightroom for retouching, the workflow is very similar to that of the Photoshop Fix command, and the same file is loaded directly from the Photos app on the iPad Pro. Lightroom's interface is immediately usable in a way that makes it simple to get started and familiarize yourself with the program. You can continue your work where you left off in previous versions. As with previous versions, you can find your photos, edit them, and reorganize them within the app as you like it. It is also possible to share your images directly to social media, or via email, print, and storage. The "organizer" feature is basically a duplicate of the catalog with its categories and albums that can be created as needed. The "lens corrections" tab comes with new features making the use of RAW formats easier. In addition, several new RAW converters can be used in Lightroom 5. The main interface for image management in Lightroom 5 has not changed much in appearance. When viewing your library, you can see a preview in the Dock as well as when you are opening folders or creating new folders. The main tab to the left of the simulator has been moved to be consistent with Apple's other applications. It used to be located under the File menu listed under "Organizer," "Layers," and "Colors," but had been moved to the main "Photos" menu, where it shared space with buttons for viewing and viewing ratings. I know I use that tab frequently and often in my workflow, so I hope Adobe keeps this tab where it belongs.

You can create a group of shape layers and then combine them into one, which makes it easier to adjust and position them. Or you can duplicate the group of shape layers and restack them any way that you'd like.
